The difference in the prevalence of hypercholesterolemia in present study was due to the difference in cut-off value for NCEP ATP III. A recent study from Jammu reported the prevalence of dyslipidemia to be 37%. In another study among college students of Karauli, the prevalence was found to be 29.5%. In a study from North-West India, the prevalence of hyperlipidemia was found to be 31.9%. The prevalence of hyperlipidemia has been found to be higher in North-Western India as compared to North-East India and a significant variation has been observed between the four geographical regions in North-East India. Thus, a higher prevalence of dyslipidemia has been reported from North-Western India, which is close to the North-West of Gujarat. The majority of the studies have been carried out in rural settings, where the prevalence of dyslipidemia is found to be higher. In the present study, the prevalence of dyslipidemia was significantly higher among urban subjects (33%) as compared to the rural subjects (21.1%). The mean TC and LDL-C among the subjects in the present study was significantly higher compared to the NCEP ATP III guidelines. The lipid levels in the present study were higher among men as compared to women, which is consistent with results reported in other Indian studies. The lipid profile among the subjects in the present study showed a mean TG level of 99 ± 59 mg/dl, which is significantly higher than the acceptable levels (648931e174
